The Vision Council’s 2024 Executive Summit brought 330 industry leaders to Naples, Florida for three action-packed days of networking, leadership development, and critical discussions that will shape the future of the optical industry. Designed to highlight emerging business trends and offer tangible strategies to tackle the evolving challenges of the eyecare and eyewear industry and the economy at large, the 2024 Executive Summit featured several engaging presentations, panel discussions, and opportunities for meaningful networking and relationship building.
As a person who is registered legally blind, the issue of avoidable sight loss is deeply personal to Caroline Casey. She has witnessed significant change in both disability inclusion and eye health over the last decade, but the scale of global disability inequality is stark.

Eye care is still unaffordable and unavailable for too many people around the world. The system is currently failing some of the most marginalized communities and the impact and consequences are profound. Sight is integral to wider health issues and facilitates better educational and employment opportunities.

Caroline challenged the attendees to make that argument loudly, clearly, and repeatedly. And with one voice. Only through collective action will we achieve the systemic change that is needed and improve the lives of billions of people and help them fulfil their full potential.

Speakers from MDHearing and Wisconsin Vision discussed the growing prominence of telehealth in vision care and the opportunity presented to optical practices by the Over-the-Counter (OTC) hearing aid law. The session explored the natural synergy between vision and hearing health, emphasizing the integration of technology and the practical implications of the OTC law. Additionally, insights were drawn from the experiences of European optical retailers who have successfully sold hearing aids in-store for over a decade. A live demonstration of a hearing test illustrated the seamless integration of technology into the assessment process and the impact on the optical patient experience.
